The ex. War is prepared to agree to the proposal made by the Governor of the Straits Settlements that the two companies of Infantry should, for the present, remain at Penang, and that the Colony should not therefore be asked, at present, to procide barrack accommodation for these two companies at Singapore as originally intended. Mr Beoretary Campbell-Bannerman would point out, however, that even if accommodation for them were thus provided, the Colonial Governnow paying more for interest and sinking mont would receive, as a set off, the barracks fund than it would have had to pay had the a d property at present occupied by the Troops it l'erang. It is, moreover to be clearly unlegstood that, in case of emergency, the Genand Officer Commanding may, at once, recall the right away and the other three boats had the troops from Penang to Singapore; and that, in issue to themselves. He said that the Ordinance worked very well and its progress silver. Fortunately the burden will not be was satisfactory; but in one respect the Ordinanon was defective. It provides by Section that the widow and orphans of a contributor any case, the annual charge for interest and who retires from the service on account of all health or the abolition of his office before he is sinking fund being a comparatively small entitled to a pension, shall not be allowed to have any benefit from the Fund. This provision was principle we say the loan ought to be a silver in great hardship and he illustrated this by quoting a case in which au officer who, on leave, suffered so seriously from ill-health that, acting on the advice of the medical attendant. the officer resigned his office before his leave expired, and six weeks afterwards he died. Had the officer not resigned he would still have been counted as in the service. The result was that the provision which the officer had looked to be made to his widow and orphana was taken away from them. By the Ordinances of Hongkoon and Coylon when a contributor retires from the service on account of ill-health or abolition of his office; his widow and orphans do not lose the

The lode has made again, and is now between 3 and 4 feet thick (of quartz) with bands of state between, but shows no gold. A trial emishing of 80 tons taken from a depth of 46 to 72 feet of the sinking, yielded 24 oz. 16 dwts. 12 grs. of smelted gold. At 72 feet, the lode cut clean out, soft black mud taking its place. This made the sinking very difficult as the water came boiling up under the bottom of the timber. The greatest care had to be exereised in sinking to save the shaft from collapsing; this continued for about 10 feet, when the ground began to get firmer, the bottom being now in good working black slate. But those who have watched the phipped heavy see carrying away steamer's gi working of the St. ff Corps may be excused if they occasionally think that those outside the signally; similar weather prevailing to arrival in appears to border on radiness. The case may be easily imagined of a young Sub florn who has done his year's probation with a British regiment, and has just been appointed to the Staff Corps. He finds himself in a untive regiment with three other officers, the remaining four who make up the complement of eight being either at home or away with other regiments, acting for absentees, according to the way in the Staff orps. His arrival unikes a third in the Mess, the dining members being himself, another Subaltern, and the Second-in-Command, an elderly Major, whose wife is at home, and who looks upon having to attend Mess every evening as a kind of purgatory. As the Major has a griovance, which he carefully nurses all dinner time, be rarely spouks to his youthful companio s. who, having seen each other at intervals all day, have nothing left to talk about in the evening, and so the ment is not a very lively one. He has now a nominal income of Rs. 325 per measem, but by the time be has paid his Mess bill, his subscriptions, hopse-rent, servents and other expenses incidental to life in India, he counts himself very fortunate if he has the odd Rs. 25 for himself. What then more natural than that, finding himself thus in affinence, he should turn his thoughts to mateimony f He has pictures of a home and a bright face opposite to him at table—a very different sort of thing from going to Mess evening after evening: New it is a well-known thing that from thinking about matrimony to matrimony itself is but a step. So the Subaltern finds it. He is in the habit of plying them. tennis in the Station gardens every afternoon that there is no drill or parado. There, of course, he meets other young people of both sexes: Lawn-tennis over, the young people saunter off, some to look at the English papers just arrived, and a couple or two to sit in the versudah and watch the stars just coming out. When he takes to this litter amusement, the older frequenters of the library know that it is all up with him. The bachelor Colonel shrugs his shoulders and winders anew, and for the - thousandth time, at the amazing felly of young mon and maidens. The collector's wife asks the Commandant's better half whether the young Subaltern has anything besides his pay, to which the latter returns on emphatic, " Not a ponny." When the General drops in to the library for five minutes as is wont every evening just to see who is there, his attention is called to what is going on by one of his lady friends. His remarks in reply need not be repeated. But our Lieutenant and his companion sit in the verandah in blissful ignorance (as is always the case) that they are attracting any notice. But everyone but themselves sees clearly enough how it will ond, and the end is not long in coming. One morning it is given out that the young couple are engaged. All the hali is are much interested. The men regard the while business as folly, and look up in his fature. as bopoless. His Colouel, in despuir at having another married officer in the regiment, and foreseeing that the Mess will have to be shut up, becs him to go into the Commissariat Department. His Adjutant tells him that married officers are the ruin of the service, and asks him if he knows Jinks of the '0th, who has over ten children. and who is said only to be able to afford meat once a week, on Sunday? But he cures for none of these things. The future is without a cloud for him. Whatever mistakes other people may have made, he is qu' to safe. He is gaing for marry and live happily over afterwards. His flances has not a farthing in the world, but it would be sorded to couple the idea of rapees and exchange with such a creature. One is quite happy to-day. Let to-morrow take care of itself. The question is whether, now that everybody's income is practically cut down to about half, this happy-go-lucky view of matrimony and its obligations will still provail? It is true that if the young Subiltern dies, his widow will have a small pension and so will not starve. This is granted by that Military Fund (still existing for Staff Corps officers under another name) which John Jacob denounced so energetically, and which also grants an allowance for each child should the father die. But even so, the prospoet before married officers is not of the brightest. Wife and children to be sent home. boys and girls to be put to school, butcher's and baker's bills to be paid, mouthly remittances to be sent homy regularly, no matter how much exchange may go down: all these things must come home some day to our young Lieutenant as t'ey do to all other married men in the gorgoons East. In the German and French Armies, no officer is allowed to marry unless he can show himself in a position to maintain a wife. In the British Army, no privata soldier is allowed to marry without the permission of his colonel. But the youthful British officer is allowed to take his own course in this matter. It is true that when he is with his English regiment, and shows a tendoncy to matrimony, his Colonel commonly advises him to join the St. If Corps. Well, he joins the Staff Corps. and we have seen what happens to him. Will this light-heartedness in taking on themselves the most serious responsibilities of life still characterize British Subalterns in the future, as it has done in the past? Time will show, Wind and the question is a very interesting one, both from a social point of view, and in regard to the interior aconomy of the Mosses of native regiments. CHAPTER XI.

AN UNEXPECTED MEETING. After the marriage of Winnie and Tom Grogory, and a whole happy month spent among the woods and wilds that surround the dreamy hand of the Lakes of Westmoreland, Gregory in his usual hearty style, proposed a visit to town "Haven't been there for many a long year, Winnie," he said. "'Pon my soul, it woul make a boy of me once more just to sit in the stalls and hear a good honest play."

Winnie, as a matter of course, assented mos readily, though for some reason or another unknown even to herself, a sudden fear had taken possession of her heart as he made the proposal It lay there for but a very short space of time then by an effort of will and reason she succeedod in banishing it.
